

RunLocal Marketing Highlights Common Digital Pitfalls Affecting Growing Businesses and Their Online Visibility

August 19, 2026

LONGMONT, CO - August 19, 2026 -

RunLocal Marketing, a Longmont, Colorado digital marketing agency, is drawing attention to a set of common online challenges that small businesses often encounter as they expand. As companies add services, reach new customers, and face increased competition, the digital presence that once supported them may no longer keep pace with their goals.

Many small businesses launch a website, set up online profiles, and establish early marketing efforts during their first years of operation. Those early decisions frequently reflect a smaller company with a narrower focus. As the business grows, however, that same foundation can begin to work against it. An outdated or underperforming website, inconsistent business information across online platforms, and difficulty maintaining search visibility are among the issues that surface most often.

Other challenges tend to develop gradually. Branding and messaging that once felt clear may become unfocused as offerings expand. Content that was created early on is often neglected and no longer reflects what the company does. Marketing activities may operate in isolation rather than reinforcing one another, leaving gaps that reduce overall effectiveness.

These problems can carry real consequences. When a website is slow, unclear, or out of date, potential customers may struggle to understand what a business offers or to trust the company. Inconsistent listings can make accurate information difficult to find, and disconnected marketing can make it harder for prospects to take the next step toward becoming customers.

Run Local Marketing points to the value of periodically evaluating a company's overall digital presence as the business evolves. Rather than treating a website, search strategy, and branding as one-time projects, the agency emphasizes reviewing them as the business changes and making improvements that support long-term growth.

"A digital presence is not something a business builds once and leaves alone," said Valerie Robinson, a spokesperson for RunLocal Marketing. "The website, the search visibility, and the messaging that served a company well in its early days often need to be revisited as the business matures. When those pieces fall out of step with where a company is headed, growth becomes more difficult than it needs to be."

Robinson noted that the challenges are rarely the result of a single misstep. "In most cases, these issues accumulate quietly over time. A business owner is focused on serving customers, and the website, listings, and content slowly drift out of date. The goal is to help owners step back, see the full picture, and align their online presence with the direction of the company."

With experience across web design and development, organic SEO, small business marketing, and online visibility, Run Local Marketing works with businesses navigating these transitions. The agency encourages owners to treat digital evaluation as an ongoing part of running a growing company rather than a task addressed only when problems become severe.
